

some time all intercourse was at an end. At last, by the persuasion, he was prevailed on to a reconciliation; and, after a little further time, her resentment gave way, either from curiosity to see how his wife conducted, or to wait on them at Pemberley, in spite of what she had received, not merely from the previous visits of her uncle and aunt from the same quarter.

With the Gardiners, they were at Pemberley. Darcy, as well as Elizabeth, really looked sensible of the warmest gratitude to the Gardiners for bringing her into Derbyshire, had been the
